

Dear Reader,

Can best friends become lovers – and true loves? Find out in the second book in my “planes, trains, automobiles, and a cruise ship” Wild Ride to Love series.

Nav Bharani is in love with his neighbor, Kat Fallon, but she’s stuck him in the buddy trap.

Kat has a disastrous history with men: she’s always picking losers and having nasty break-ups. Nav’s the best friend she’s ever had and, though she’s attracted to him, she can’t risk losing him. Besides, he’s not the larger-than-life kind of guy she normally goes for.

When Kat tells Nav she’ll be traveling home from Montreal by train for her baby sister’s wedding – and says trains are a different world where normal rules don’t apply – Nav hatches a brilliant plan.

He’ll seize the opportunity to play “stranger on the train” – and seduce Kat into seeing him in a whole new light!

I hope you’ll join Kat and Nav on their “wild ride to love.”

Excerpt from Love, Unexpectedly

Determined to make Kat see him as more than a buddy, Nav transforms himself and appears on her first train trip as a sexy stranger. Though she knows who he really is, she buys into the game so she can explore a fantasy she's previously denied herself. She agrees to share his hotel room in Toronto.

They stood side by side, sipping champagne and looking at the cityscape. Lights glittered in hundreds of windows, bright against the deepening purple sky of approaching night.

"The city's shifting from her daylight persona to her evening one," Nav commented.

She glanced at him. "What a lovely way of putting it."

"Inside all those windows, people are making that same shift. Getting dressed up to go out, or changing into comfy clothes to curl up with a book or TV show." He smiled down at her. "And then there's us."

He put his champagne glass on a table by the window, took hers and did the same, then rested his hands lightly on her shoulders. "We aren't going out."

Gazing up into his eyes as if mesmerized, she shook her head. "No."

"Nor watching TV or reading."

Another head-shake. Her pulse fluttered in the hollow of her throat. A spot he very much wanted to kiss.

"Here's what we're going to do while the sun finishes setting." He tilted his head and bent down, letting his intent show on his face.

She came up on her toes, rising to meet him. "Yes." Her soft breath whispered against his mouth. Wine, mint. She'd brushed her teeth for him, as he had for her.

Her lips were pink, gleaming, full. Parted the tiniest bit. And then his lips touched them. Softly, but with no tentativeness. He claimed her mouth with a gentle, sure kiss.

When she responded, he angled his head and explored her lips thoroughly, kissing and nibbling, darting his tongue around the outside rim but not plunging inside. He'd wanted to kiss her for so long and now they were alone together so he could savor every moment. He sucked on the fullness of her bottom lip and she gave a soft moan.

His blood thickened, surged through his veins. Finally, he had no need to conceal the effect she had on him. He wrapped his arms around Kat and pressed the front of his body against hers.

She didn't hesitate before returning the pressure.

Now that her eyes were closed, he could stare at her face all he wanted and not bother to hide his joy and love.
